24 – 26 June 2010

Barcelona, Spain

A European workshop organised by:

Background and Aims

The future of society will be decided in cities where economic, social and cultural developments are concentrated and condensed. Cities appear as “catalysts” of deep-reaching negotiation processes between tradition and innovation, between stagnation and continuity.

Individuals and groups from different milieus, origins, ethnicities face each other. They are confronted with the other and unknown, with different lifestyles, ways of behaviour and ideologies. Fears and hopes, opportunities and risks: Urbanity in the 21st century is closely linked to identity processes and challenges for citizenship education.

Social justice is the core of urban politics. In the cities, basic needs such as belonging, home, possibilities to participate and develop become questions of vital significance. These social challenges are not the only urban-political tasks to be solved. Actors in cities are confronted with a wickerwork of effects which is entirely new in its complexity:

- general globalisation effects
- demographic shifts
- migration
- trends towards segregation
- development of retail trade
- new expectations towards the city as a space of living, working, leisure time.

How can citizenship education at the European level appropriately react to these challenges and also initiate new models of participation? This will be the topic of the workshop.

The participative concept of the workshop is reflected in the intense discussions among all invited experts that follow the short introductions of each topic by one or two inputs.
